Prof. Bhawna Priya
Assistant Professor

Abstract: This paper explores the role of return policies on trade credit offered by suppliers to retailers. Traditional trade credit agreements, wherein a supplier extends a short-term loan to a retailer, can lead to over-ordering by the retailer even though she is financially constrained (FC), and this can affect supply chain efficiency. With ever-increasing product-handling costs, such over-ordering can have a severe impact on the supply chain profit. Motivated by our work with an industry partner, we design a game-theoretic model to evaluate optimal stocking decisions and wholesale prices in an FC supply chain, analyze the traditional trade credit model, and establish the reasons for over-ordering by the retailer when trade credit is deployed. We then examine how product returns, prevalent in the industry, can be used to control over-ordering. We design three different mechanisms incorporating returns in a trade credit model: quantity-limit-based returns, partial refund based returns, and marginal refund based returns. We find that returns-based policies improve profits for all members of the supply chain by driving inventory reduction and reducing over-ordering when trade credit is used. We also perform numerical analysis to quantify the impact of key parameters on the optimal decision variables. Our paper contributes by suggesting easy-to-implement mechanisms for improving trade credit deployment in supply chains and provides useful insights to decision makers to incorporate returns in trade credit policies.

Abstract: To accomplish the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs), which were adopted by all 193 United Nations (UN) member states in Sept'2015, financial institutions (FIs) may play a significant role in tackling socio-ecological concerns by recognising socially conscientious borrowers for long-term investments. This letter outlines the various initiatives and responsibilities might be fulfilled by FIs to achieve the objective of sustainable investments under SDGs. It also suggests an approach that considers economic, social, environmental, and governance issues to identify sustainable borrowers for investment opportunities to achieve the goal under SDGs.

Prof. Ranjan DasGupta
Associate Professor

Abstract: We examine whether country-level national culture dimensions might moderate an international firm's environmental, social, governance performance to strengthen or weaken its financial performance based on the Institutional Difference Hypothesis. We find that low power distance, high individualism, high masculinity, high uncertainty avoidance, long-term orientation, and indulgent national culture would moderate a firm's environmental, social, governance performance to strengthen its-

-financial performance further. On the contrary, high power distance, collectivism (low individualism), feminine, low uncertainty avoidance, short-term orientation, and restraint dimensions would be expected to weaken a firm's financial performance by discouraging firms from undertaking superior environmental, social, governance performance. GLOBE's findings such as low power distance, collectivistic institutional and in-group national culture, high uncertainty avoidance, future orientation, all report a significant positive moderation impact on a firm's environmental, social, governance performance to strengthen its financial performance further. However, high gender-egalitarian national culture and high assertiveness would negatively moderate firm's financial performance and environmental, social, governance performance. Overall, we think that our findings would further propagate the institutional difference hypothesis as we observe that each of our studied national culture dimensions would moderate firm's environmental, social, governance performance and financial performance associations significantly.

Abstract: Empirical studies examining firm environmental, social, governance [ESG] and financial performance have provided contradictory results. The institutional difference hypothesis (Julian and Ofori-Dankwa, 2013) has portrayed that embedded legal, cultural, social, and economic institutional environment could be behind such results. Therefore, our motivation in this study is to examine whether country-specific legal origin (civil vs. common law), investors protection rights (strong vs. weak), national culture (ESG-averse vs. ESG-seeking), and corruption level (low vs. high) play a mediating role in nourishing firm ESG performance to strengthen or weaken its financial performance around the world. Our findings show that common law countries firms, firms from ESG-seeking national culture, and firms operating in high corruption environment undertake more ESG performance to improve their financial performance. Furthermore, strong investors protection rights negatively mediate firm ESG and financial performance relationship. Economic status of a country takes an important role only in case of emerging economies firms.
